“A year or two ago,” he said, “I was in rooms in Great Ormond Street-an old house on the Holborn side. The bedroom walls had been distempered by a previous tenant, but the place was damp and great patches of discolouration had broken out. One of these –as indeed often happens – was exactly like a human face; but more faithfully and startlingly than is customary. Lying in bed in the morning putting off getting up, I used to watch it and watch it, and gradually I came to think of it as real – as my fellow lodger, in fact. The odd thing was that while the patches on the walls grew larger and changed their contours, this never did. It remained identically the same.

“While there, I had a very bad attack of influenza, with complications, and all day long I had nothing to do but read or meditate, and it was then that this face began to get a firmer hold of me. It grew more and more real and remarkable. I may say that it dominated my thoughts day and night. There was a curious turn to the nose, and the slant of the forehead was unique. It was, in fact, full of individuality, the face of a man apart, a man in a thousand.

As I always do, I looked at once at the wall on which the face is to be seen. I rubbed my eyes and sprang up in alarm. It was only faintly visible. Last night it had been as clear as ever- almost I could hear it speak. And now it was but a ghost of itself.

“I got up dazed and dejected and went out. The early editions of the newspapers were already out, and on the contents bill I saw ‘American millionaire’s Motor Accident’. You must all of you have seen it. I bought it and read at once what I knew I should read. Mr. Ormaond Wall, the Pittsburg millionaire, and party, motoring from Spezzia to Pisa, had come into collision, with a wagon and were overturned, Mr. Wall’s condition was critical.
